

Title	The 'West Indian" Front Room in the African Diaspora
Type	Article
URL	https://ualresearchonline.arts.ac.uk/id/eprint/9380/
Date	2003
Citation	McMillan, Michael (2003) The 'West Indian" Front Room in the African Diaspora. Fashion Theory: The Journal of Dress, Body and Culture, 7 (3/4). pp. 1-18. ISSN 1362-704X
Creators	McMillan, Michael

Usage Guidelines

Please refer to usage guidelines at <http://ualresearchonline.arts.ac.uk/policies.html> or alternatively contact ualresearchonline@arts.ac.uk.

License: Creative Commons Attribution Non-commercial No Derivatives

Unless otherwise stated, copyright owned by the author

The 'West Indian' Front Room in the African Diaspora (Abstract)

The Front Room is an icon of kitsch furniture, consumer fetish and home-made furnishings, that resonates throughout the African Diaspora. Diaspora here, echoes Stuart Hall's concept of cultural identity as a performative process: dialectically continuous and disruptive. The term 'West Indian' is inscribed in the representation of the 'Front Room', and refers to a particular juncture, when cultural political shifts mediated by anti-colonialist struggles, signified a decolonising process. Second generation black artists have largely over-domesticated and stereotyped their parents as conservative in representing the Front Room, yet it's dressing, reflected an aspirational attitude through black women's participation in consumer culture. It's practice raises issues of 'good grooming' amongst people of African descent, that echoes Daniel Miller's duality: transcendent and transient: 'artificial things which are viewed as long-lasting, and things covered over which are seen as cherished for the future.' The juxtaposition of Jim Reeves, crochet doilies, 'Blue-Spot' gramophones, Jesus Christ in 3D at The Last Supper, plastic covered upholstery, was less about valorised white-bias ideals of beauty, than the creolisation of popular culture. It's contradictory nature, reveals diasporic identities; inter-generational identifications and disavowal; gendered practices in the domestic domain and struggles over meaning and authenticity in the museum/gallery culture.

© Michael McMillan - May 2003

